New infrastructure is making remote parts of the world more accessible

Hospitality openings and aviation firsts are rendering far corners of the world easier to visit—perfect for intrepid but crowd-weary travelers ready to explore farther afield. The countries bordering Thailand are catching up to their popular neighbor: Posh hotels like the Shangri-La Phnom Penh are opening in the Cambodian capital, while in Laos, luxury river cruises are sailing the less explored upper Mekong. New direct flights on United Airlines to the just-opened Nuuk International Airport in Greenland are ideal for those who've done Iceland. Stylish safari stays, like the rebuilt Gorilla Forest Lodge, an A&K Sanctuary, and Wildplaces Africa's new River Station, are making Uganda more accessible and comfortable. “Among travelers right now there's an openness to places where they or their friends haven't been before,” says Sanjay Saxena of Nomadic Expeditions, who takes clients to lesser visited Indian states including Assam for wildlife and Arunachal Pradesh for mountain vistas. “We work with not just hard-core adventurers but also the soft adventurer.”
